Introduction

"The use of death penalty as a deter of crimes"

Welcome, delegates to the General Assembly in the 16th edition of the Model of the United Nations Instituto Oriente 2026. On behalf of Instituto Oriente, the Academy of English and the Secretariat, we, as a Chair, are incredibly appreciative and honored to have you as delegates in this committee since the Chair genuinely thinks that everyone of you will reach your greatest potential and contribute stunningly throughout the entire model.

We, as a Chair, firmly believe that every delegate has something meaningful to say, specifically that they are agents of change motivated to contribute thoughts and actions in order to lead forward a change in society, especially when dealing with a topic as significant and controversial as the death penalty.

In accordance with the General Assembly's protocol, the Chair shall lead a voting process to choose which of the two provided topics will be selected for further analysis.

The first topic to be voted for addresses current issues, such as accusations and sentences imposed on certain individuals, besides the ethical dilemma presented when an individual is sentenced to death.

We, as the General Assembly's Chair, selected this topic not just because it is a contentious issue in society, but because it affects a marginalized group of human beings.

Death penalty, also known as capital punishment, refers to the state-sanctioned murdering of a person as punishment for a crime. It is a legal process where a person is sentenced to death by a court after being convicted of a capital offense, which can be carried out through various methods. These include lethal injection, electrocution, hanging, firing squad, lethal gas, and beheading. Historically, stoning and crucifixion have also been used.

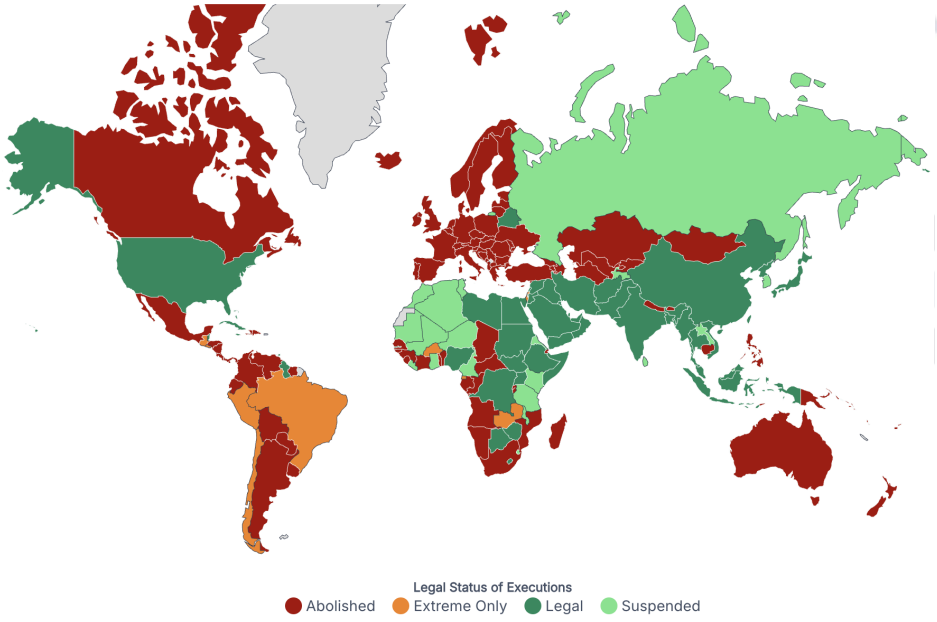

Many countries have abolished the death penalty. Notable examples include most of Europe, including countries like the Federal Republic of Germany, French Republic, and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, Canada, the Commonwealth of Australia, New Zealand and most of South America. Additionally, some countries have abolished it for ordinary crimes but retain it for exceptional circumstances like bellicose conflicts.

Some of the countries where the death penalty is still legal include People's Republic of China, the Islamic Republic of Iran, the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia, the United States of America and Japan. The death penalty is enforced in cases of extremely grave crimes, predominantly those that are recognized to be particularly serious by a nation's law, such as murder, inhuman treatment and in some cases crimes involving drugs or criminal groups.

Several human rights organizations, such as Amnesty International, consistently document and report their opposition to the death penalty in all cases, irrespective of the crime, the accused, or the execution method.

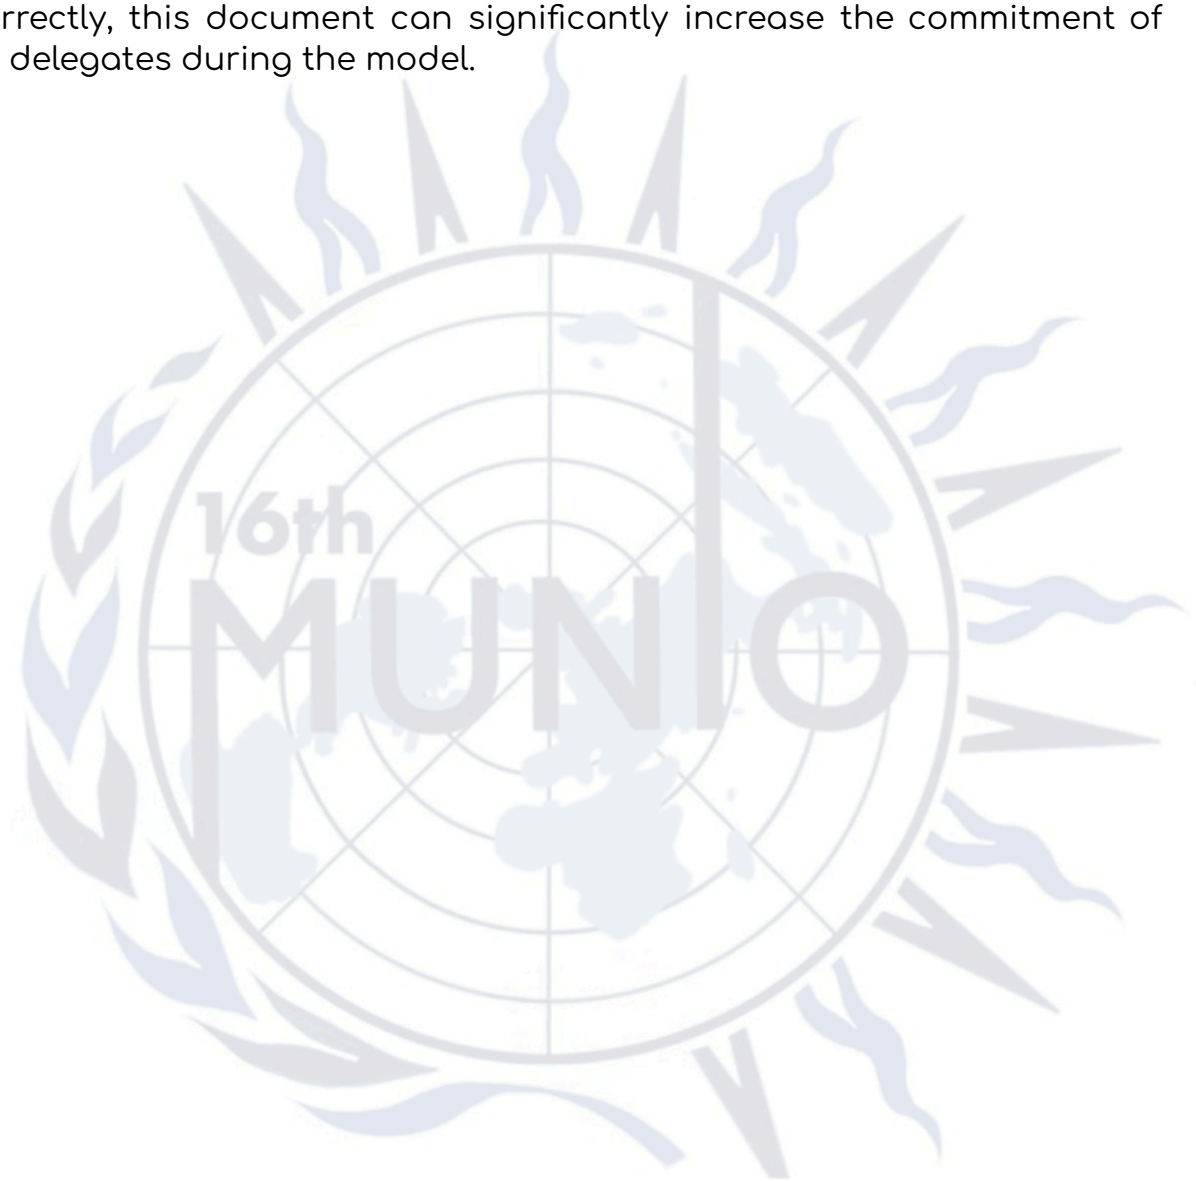

Nevertheless, there are opposing viewpoints, some Asian and Middle Eastern countries support the death penalty. In fact, there are some countries where the death penalty has become more prevalent in recent decades, so it is crucial for this committee to discuss this topic by taking a more comprehensive view of it. We, as an international community, can protect our citizens and future generations.

The present document contains essential information about the topic, allowing the delegates to perform effectively during this model, including statistics and controversial points, which may be highly helpful when delegates prepare their stance.

We, as the General Assembly's Chair, have confidence that if used correctly, this document can significantly increase the commitment of all delegates during the model.

History of the Committee

Establishment and Foundation

The General Assembly (GA) is the main policy-making organ of the United Nations. It provides a unique forum for multilateral discussion of the full spectrum of international issues covered by the agenda of the United Nations. Each of the 193 Member States of the United Nations have an equal vote.

The Charter of the United Nations is the founding document of the United Nations. It was signed on 26 June 1945, in San Francisco, at the conclusion of the United Nations Conference on International Organization and with this document the General Assembly was established. Convened its first session four months after the end of "World War II" on January 10th, 1946 in London, England.

Structure and Role

Today, the General Assembly consists of all 193 Member States with each having an equal vote, irrespective of size, wealth, or political influence. It plays a central role in the United Nations system by providing a unique forum for all countries to share their stance and to cooperate over global challenges.

The General Assembly plays a vital role in:

- Approving the United Nations budget and determining financial contributions from each member state.
- Electing non-permanent members to the Security Council and other United Nations organs.
- Promoting international peace and security, especially through dialogue and recommendations.
- Developing international law through codification and standard-setting.
- Encouraging global cooperation in areas such as human rights, economic development, health, education, and environmental sustainability.

Global Action and Sustainable Development

In September 2015, the General Assembly adopted the 2030 Agenda for Sustainable Development, which includes 17 Sustainable Development Goals (SDGs) aimed at eliminating the scarcity of economic resources, protecting the planet, and ensuring prosperity for all. These goals underscore the General Assembly's evolving role in addressing 21st-century challenges.

The General Assembly's overall goal is to offer a forum for inclusive debate and international collaboration in which all countries, regardless of political, economic or military might can participate equitably. It promotes the peaceful resolution of conflicts, the advancement of international laws, and the collective effort to address the world's most serious challenges. Through its international mandate, the General Assembly works to promote unity, global stability, and sustainable growth, serving as a central space for consensus-building and coordinated global action.

— Ban Ki-moon

Long Term

The death penalty has been debated for several years, with some countries viewing it as a deterrent to serious crimes. However, its fairness and effectiveness have been questioned by organizations like the United Nations and Amnesty International. Since the early 2000s, many countries have abolished it, and over 170 United Nations Member States no longer use it. Still, some nations maintain or expand its use, especially in response to violence, drugs, or political unrest, highlighting tensions between security and human rights.

Political Consequences

The death penalty remains a political tool in some nations, used to project authority or suppress dissent, and occasionally leveraged during electoral campaigns.

Globally, its use has declined over the past two decades, with many nations adopting moratoriums or abolishing it outright, spurring debates on human rights, judicial errors, and legal reform. Nonetheless, its application persists unevenly, reflecting cultural and political differences, particularly in more traditionalist societies.

Social Consequences

The death penalty's support has declined globally, between 2005 and 2015, due to concerns about fairness, human rights, and wrongful convictions. Victims' families were divided, some were in favor of executions, while others opposed them for ethical reasons. The death penalty was denounced by human rights organizations as a violation of fundamental rights. However, one of its primary defenses was undermined when a 2012 United States of America study found no solid proof that it deters crime.

Various studies have found that socioeconomic status, race, and ethnic origin determine who receives this sentence, perpetuating social inequities. Alternatives such as rehabilitation or social reintegration are ignored in favor of harsh punishment.

Economic Consequences

The death penalty imposes heavy financial burdens on justice systems globally. According to studies, capital cases cost much more than non-capital cases due to long trials, appeals, and incarceration costs. This diverts funding away from crime prevention and social services in low and middle income countries. Some nations repealed capital punishment partly to reduce these costs.

Cooperation with abolitionist blocs like the European Union was occasionally hampered by the death penalty's continued use internationally. By 2014, many experts agreed that the economic strain of executions outweighed their unproven benefits.

In countries that abolished the death penalty, such as the United Kingdom, which formally ended capital punishment for all crimes in 1998, governments reported significant financial savings by eliminating the high costs associated with capital trials and appeals. These funds were redirected to programs like victim support and community safety initiatives.

Short term

In the last 5 years, the death penalty has seen an increase in executions, reaching its highest level since 2017 in 2022, according to Amnesty International. While some countries have moved towards abolition, others have increased its use, especially in cases of drug-related and criminal groups offenses.

The global evolution of the death penalty in recent years confirms that the world is continuously moving towards its abolition. Despite the increase in the number of executions, fewer countries carry out the death penalty as a punishment. In this regard, Amnesty International documented executions in 15 countries compared to 20 in 2022 and 16 in 2023, the lowest number of countries recorded by Amnesty International.

Political Consequences

The death penalty has significant political implications that transcend its role in criminal justice. It polarizes political parties, with conservatives often supporting it and progressives opposing it on human rights grounds. It can influence elections and public opinion, especially when it relates to issues such as crime or systemic bias. Also, it affects a country's reputation, as global organizations are increasingly pressing for its abolition. Countries that maintain the death penalty may face diplomatic criticism and economic consequences, including trade or aid restrictions. Furthermore, the high economic cost of capital punishment is putting pressure on governments to reconsider its use. In general, the death penalty influences national and international politics, often at the expense of justice and public trust.

Social Consequences

Globally, social inequities surrounding the death penalty were initially due to de jure segregation, but now stem from de facto segregation. All racial groups now have equal rights and protections under constitutional law. However, factors such as geography, financial status, the quality of legal counsel, and jury jurisdiction have naturally segregated the population and made those who are marginalized in society particularly susceptible.

In the last five years, the death penalty has deepened social divisions, especially along racial, economic, and cultural lines. It has disproportionately affected marginalized communities, raised concerns about wrongful convictions, and sparked global movements demanding justice reform. Public awareness and activism have increased, leading to growing calls for abolition and greater focus on human rights.

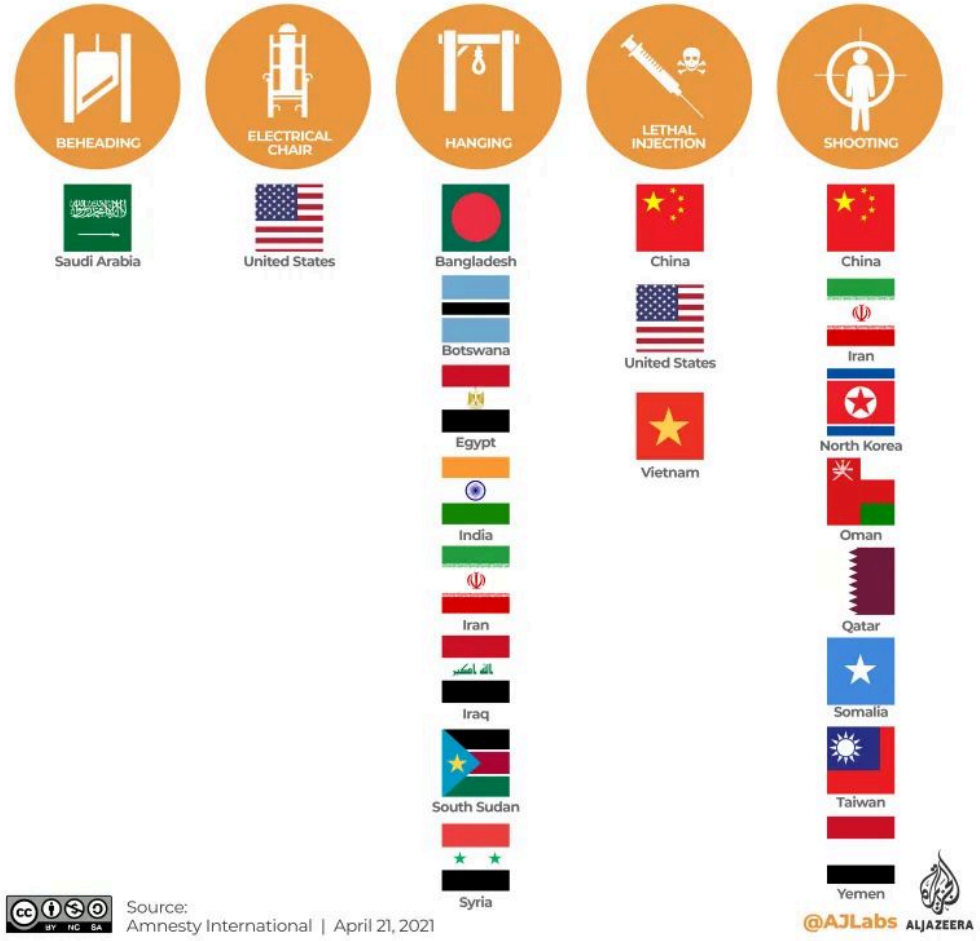

Economic Consequences

The death penalty, beyond its ethical and legal dimensions, entails high economic costs for the countries that maintain it. Globally, capital trials are more costly than those resulting in life imprisonment, due to their complexity, the involvement of experts, and the multiple appeals that can extend for decades. These processes represent a disproportionate use of public resources, often without resulting in an effective execution. Moreover, maintaining the "death row" entails additional expenses for security and specialized confinement.

On the international stage, its application can lead to diplomatic sanctions, affect economic agreements, and damage the nation's reputation, with negative consequences for investment and tourism. There is also the economic risk of executing innocent people, which can lead to million-dollar compensations and a loss of confidence in the judicial system. Overall, the death penalty constitutes a high and inefficient cost, and its resources could be allocated to more effective and humane policies to combat crime.

DEATH SENTENCES AND EXECUTIONS 2020

Methods of executions in 2020

Topic and the United Nations

The United Nations (UN) involvement on the topic of the death penalty reflects its broader commitment to promoting human rights, dignity, and justice. Since its founding, the United Nations has promoted international standards that defend the right to life and condemn the use of cruel, inhumane, or degrading treatment and punishment. In this framework, the UN has progressively formed the international debate on the death penalty, considering it as a practice that compromises justice and the safeguarding of fundamental rights.

Throughout decades, the UN has continuously expressed concerns about the use of the death penalty, especially when it is applied as a deterrent to crime, through direct interaction, monitoring, and reporting with Member States. According to the United Nations, such explanation lacks a sound evidence basis and undermines efforts to create effective, compassionate, and rights-based justice systems.

While the United Nations does not impose a legal ban on capital punishment, it actively encourages Member States to minimize its use and work toward abolition. The UN has made clear that there is no solid evidence proving that the death penalty deters crime more effectively than other forms of punishment.

Despite these advances, some countries continue to apply the death penalty, often justifying it as necessary to maintain public safety. The UN remains engaged with these nations to promote fair legal procedures, transparency, and alternatives to the death penalty that respect human rights and justice.

Declarations and Resolutions

The most important legal instruments determining the United Nations position are the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR) and its Second Optional Protocol, approved in 1966, which explicitly calls for the elimination of the death penalty. Article 6 of the ICCPR safeguards the right to life and stipulates that, where the death penalty has not been abolished, it will only be applied for the "most serious crimes." As of 2024, over 90 countries have ratified the Second Optional Protocol.

The United Nations General Assembly has also passed several resolutions since 2007 calling for a global moratorium on executions. The most recent, Resolution A/RES/79/179, approved in 2024, received support from 130 countries. These resolutions are not legally binding but represent growing international agreement that capital punishment should end.

United Nations Bodies and Institutional Response

United Nations agencies have taken clear positions against the death penalty. The Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights (OHCHR) has emphasized that capital punishment is frequently used in discriminatory and arbitrary ways, particularly against disadvantaged and marginalized people.

The United Nations Human Rights Council (UNHRC) and Special Rapporteurs have expressed concern about countries that continue to carry out executions, particularly for crimes that do not satisfy the "most serious crimes" criterion under international law. This includes drug-related transgressions in countries like the Islamic Republic of Iran and Saudi Arabia.

United Nations Actions and Programs

The United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime (UNODC) and the United Nations Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice Programme assist countries in reforming their judicial systems. These programs focus on improving access to fair trials, strengthening legal protections, and promoting alternatives to the death penalty.

UNODC additionally provides technical assistance and promotes crime prevention strategies such as community policing, anti-corruption measures, and social development projects. These programs seek to reduce crime without using the death penalty while simultaneously increasing public trust in justice institutions.

Controversy points

Why is it a controversial topic?

The death penalty continues to be a deeply controversial issue in today's world due to a combination of moral, legal, and practical factors. Morally, many people, including religious and human rights groups, argue that taking a life, even in response to a serious crime, is inherently wrong and violates the principle of human dignity. Legally, the risk of wrongful convictions makes the practice extremely problematic. Innocent people have been sentenced to death and, in some cases, executed, revealing serious flaws in the justice system.

There is also clear evidence that the death penalty is not applied equally. Racial minorities, the lack of economic resources in some groups and those without access to good legal defense are more likely to be sentenced to death penalty, raising concerns about systemic discrimination and injustice. On a practical level, the death penalty is more expensive than life imprisonment due to lengthy trials and appeals, and studies have shown it does not deter crime more effectively.

Furthermore, international pressure has intensified as organizations like the United Nations call for global abolition, viewing the death penalty as incompatible with human rights standards. As public opinion shifts and more countries move toward abolition, the death penalty faces growing criticism as an outdated and unjust form of punishment.

What positions are there on the topic?

In a society where serious crimes are committed every day, some arguments in favor of the death penalty are:

In favor

- Deterrence of serious crimes: Supporters claim that the death penalty deters heinous crimes like murder and criminal groups more effectively than life imprisonment. In order to prevent possible future crimes.
- Retribution and justice for victims: In many countries, a majority of the population supports the death penalty, especially for crimes like murder or extremist violence, lending it democratic legitimacy.

- PPermanent removal of threat: Capital punishment is perceived by some as a definitive measure to eliminate the risk of reoffending, particularly in cases where the offender is considered an ongoing danger to public safety.

Against

- Risk of executing innocent people: The death penalty is irreversible, and judicial systems can make mistakes. Innocent people have been wrongly sentenced and executed.
- Racial and socioeconomic bias: The death penalty is disproportionately applied to impoverished people and ethnic minorities, raising concerns of systemic injustice.
- Violation of Human Rights: The death penalty is considered a violation of the right to life and the prohibition of cruel, inhuman, or degrading punishment.
- High financial costs: Death penalty cases are significantly more expensive than life imprisonment due to extended trials, appeals, and legal procedures.

Where is the debate?

One of the main reasons for the debate is the conflict between justice and human rights. While supporters believe that capital punishment delivers justice by punishing the most serious crimes, such as murder, criminal groups, or drug trafficking, opponents argue that it violates the fundamental right to life and human dignity. International bodies like the United Nations and Amnesty International consider the death penalty a cruel and inhuman punishment, and they call for its global abolition.

Public opinion also plays a major role in the debate. In some countries, a majority of citizens support the death penalty, believing it deters crime and provides closure to victims' families. In others, growing awareness of racial and economic bias, wrongful convictions, and the high financial cost of executions has led to increased public opposition. As societies evolve, many people are rethinking whether state-sanctioned executions reflect modern values or simply prolong cycles of violence.

Additionally, various social factors influence how the death penalty is applied. Studies have shown that it is often used disproportionately against racial minorities, and those without access to quality legal defense. This raises concerns about fairness and discrimination within justice systems, especially in countries where legal protections are weak or politically influenced. Looking to the future, the continued use of the death penalty can have serious repercussions.

The debate is further complicated by discrimination, human rights violations, inequality, and the punitive systems of each nation.

Objectives

We, as a committee, seek to address this ongoing global controversy by prioritizing the promotion of justice, the protection of fundamental human rights, and the guarantee of security for society and individuals involved in criminal justice systems.

Having in consideration the point of view of:

- Nations: Countries around the world hold contrasting positions on this matter. While some maintain the death penalty within their legal systems, others have moved toward restriction or abolition, reflecting evolving views on justice, punishment, and human dignity.
- Specialists: Many experts and organizations dedicated to the defense of human rights have questioned the effectiveness of capital punishment as a deterrent. They raise concerns about the lack of conclusive evidence supporting its use and emphasize the irreversible consequences that can result from judicial errors.

- Civilians: Members of civil society, including victims' families and affected communities, express a wide range of ethical and emotional perspectives. Their voices reflect both the desire for justice and accountability, as well as concerns over fairness, discrimination, and the need for healing.

The Chair has selected five key objectives it hopes the committee develops through debate:

● Explore alternative crime prevention models that prioritize rehabilitation, social reintegration, and fair sentencing.

● Encourage Member States to promote judicial transparency and ensure that all capital cases follow fair trial procedures.

● Seek the participation of human rights experts and legal researchers to contribute to discussions on the death penalty and its implications.

● Regulate and monitor national legal processes to avoid the use of capital punishment in cases involving vulnerable populations.

● Look to build consensus around international legal frameworks that balance state sovereignty and human rights standards regarding capital punishment.

Therefore, our objective as Chair is to lead delegates to a resolution that recognizes the complexities of this topic. This Chair expects delegates to bring to the discussion innovative and sensitive policies that promote justice, improve public safety, and protect fundamental rights including proposing universal solutions that benefit and protect citizens. Let this be a space to question, listen, propose, and work towards a better informed and humane criminal justice system.

Conclusion

The objective of this committee is to encourage delegates to critically examine the use of the death penalty as a deterrent to crime, and to inspire significant debate based on legal, ethical, and humanitarian grounds. This topic remains one of the most divisive and complex issues in international law and human rights, requiring delegates to go beyond statistics and confront the realities behind each policy.

The death penalty represents a challenge to the very essence of human dignity. Its implementation raises profound concerns regarding the fallibility of justice systems, the risk of irreversible error, and the unequal treatment often faced by marginalized groups.

This practice also imposes a psychological toll, not only on those facing execution and their families, but also on the professionals required to carry out or witness such sentences. Its continued use in certain societies may reflect deeply rooted beliefs about punishment and control, but it also signals an ongoing need for reform, reflection, and dialogue. The global community must ask itself whether a justice system that chooses death over rehabilitation truly advances peace, security, and the values we claim to uphold as an international society.

As delegates of this committee, you are entrusted with the responsibility of exploring diverse perspectives with an open mind, questioning entrenched narratives, and drafting resolutions that prioritize justice and humanity. The purpose of this debate is not to polarize, but to humanize, to examine the broader implications of state-sanctioned death in an era that increasingly values rehabilitation, human rights, and restorative justice.

Once again, we, as a Chair, extend our deepest gratitude to the Secretariat for the opportunity to serve as part of MUNIO 16th and thank each delegate for your commitment to this pressing topic and for trusting us with your voices in this vital discussion. We, as a Chair encourage you to challenge yourselves, research deeply, and engage with diplomacy, empathy, and purpose throughout this model.

Delegate, you have become an element of the transformation.

Countries

Canada

Canada abolished the death penalty for civilian crimes in 1976 and fully eliminated it from military law in 1998. The Criminal Code was amended to replace capital punishment with life imprisonment, and the last execution occurred in 1962.

Since abolition, The Dominion of Canada has taken a strong international stance against the death penalty. The government regularly advocates for global abolition at the United Nations and supports initiatives promoting human rights and the right to life. This position is reflected in the Dominion of Canada's foreign policy and its refusal to support capital punishment in any jurisdiction.

Islamic Republic of Iran

The Islamic Republic of Iran retains the death penalty as part of its legal system, based on Islamic Sharia law and outlined in the Islamic Penal Code. It applies to crimes such as murder, drug trafficking, and offenses like "enmity against God."

The Islamic Republic of Iran, despite being a participant in the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR), faces criticism for executions of minors and non-violent offenders. In 2023, it carried out over 500 executions, many for drug-related crimes.

Some reforms have reduced mandatory death penalties, but Iran continues to defend its use as lawful and sovereign, despite growing international criticism.

Kingdom of Spain

The Kingdom of Spain completely abolished the death penalty in 1995. This culminated a process that began with the 1978 Constitution, which prohibited it for most crimes. Since then, the Kingdom of Spain has become an active advocate for the global abolition of the death penalty, signing and promoting international treaties such as the Second Optional Protocol to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights.

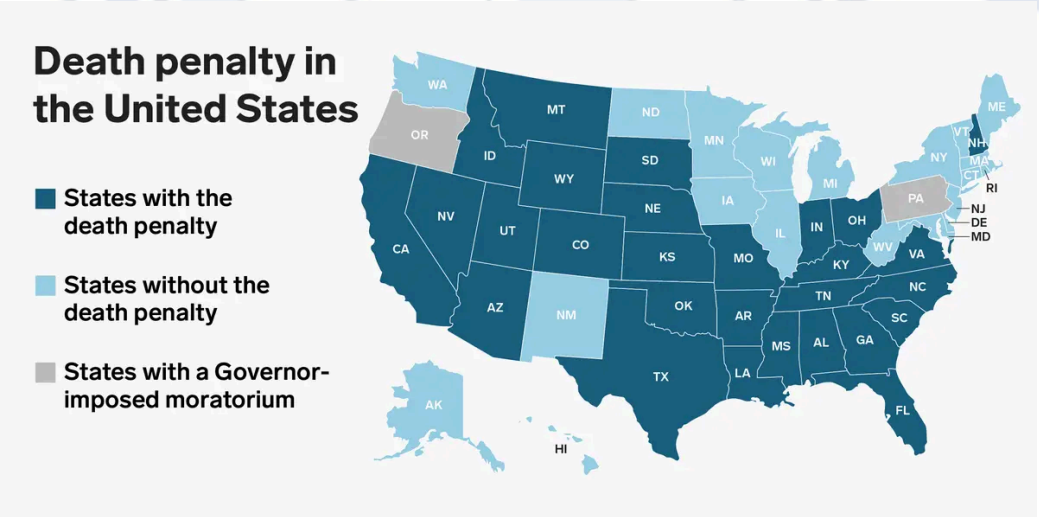

People's Republic of China

The People's Republic of China retains the death penalty and is believed to carry out the most executions globally, though official data is kept secret.

Chinese law allows capital punishment for many crimes, including non-violent ones, with mandatory Supreme Court review since 2007. The People's Republic of China is not part of the Second Optional Protocol to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR) and defends the death penalty as a tool for deterrence and stability.

United States of America

The United States of America maintains the death penalty federally and in 24 states, though others have abolished or paused it. While the Eighth Amendment bans cruel punishment, the Supreme Court has upheld capital punishment.

Laws such as the 1996 Anti-Criminal Groups and Effective Death Penalty Act guide its use. Internationally, the United States of America, has signed but not ratified abolition treaties, emphasizing national sovereignty.

Executions and public support are declining. In 2023, there were 24 executions and 21 new death sentences, reflecting ongoing national debate.
